New Listings in the National Register of Historic Places

The following properties in South Carolina were recently listed in the National Register of Historic Places. For more information about the National Register program visit <https://scdah.sc.gov/historic-preservation/programs/national-register>.

The Robert J. and Lula Ginn House at 106 Webb Street in Anderson was listed in the National Register of Historic Places on September 23, 2019. Built in 1910, the Robert J. and Lula Ginn House is an excellent example of an intact Colonial Revival residence. The building features a hipped roof with intersecting gables over multiple full height polygonal bays topped with massive pediments, massive granite chimneys, and an extensive wraparound porch with sixteen Tuscan columns and entablature. The house has thirty-six large one-over-one double hung sash windows, most with original wavy glass. The house is placed upon a granite rubble stone foundation, and features terracing, flared and graduated cheek-walled stone and concrete entry steps, and capped granite retaining walls along its street and alley elevations. The property also retains one original outbuilding.

The Mosquito Beach Historic District in the vicinity of Charleston, James Island and Folly Beach, Charleston County was listed in the National Register on September 23, 2019. The Mosquito Beach Historic District is a significant and well-preserved cultural, commercial, and recreational epicenter for the coastal black community in the Charleston area during Jim Crow segregation. Outstanding features of the district include its retained viewshed and rural landscape, as well as the survival of midcentury structures representative of the area's recreational peak during the Jim Crow era. The buildings, although simple and vernacular in nature, retain original finishes and detail, and their arrangement within the preserved landscape of Mosquito Beach, as well as the surviving remnants of the boardwalk, still reflect the original intent for the strip: a place of socializing and congregation.

The Mt. Zion Institute High School at 250 N. Walnut Street in Winnsboro, was listed in the National Register of Historic Places on September 30, 2019. The Mt. Zion Institute High School is a complex of three buildings significant for its association with the New Deal and public education in Fairfield County and for its architecture. The main brick school building, built in 1937 by the Public Works Administration and designed by prominent Columbia-based architect James B. Urquhart, consists of a classroom wing, auditorium, and gymnasium. The work was partially funded by the Works Progress Administration (WPA) which supported and supplemented local heritage and architecture during the Great Depression. When built, the new high school was a modern addition to an historic campus that had served the town since the 18th century. The property also includes a late 19th century wood-frame Folk Victorian teacherage as well as a brick, one-story cafeteria, built between 1950 and 1955 on the north side of a since destroyed grammar school.

Holly Springs School at 130 Holly Springs Road in Belton was listed in the National Register on October 7, 2019. It is locally significant as an early example of an African American school in Greenville County. Built ca. 1891, the school is a single-story, one-room, wood-frame building with a double front entrance. The school stands as a symbol of the educational struggle of freed men and women in the late 19th century as they worked to overcome the lingering effects of slavery-era anti-literacy laws and provide their children with education despite the re-enshrinement of white supremacy following Reconstruction. It continued to serve nearby black families until 1951, when Greenville County officials shuttered the school as part of a statewide campaign to equalize, and thereby preserve, segregated education.

The Chapin Commercial Historic District in downtown Chapin in Lexington County was listed in the National Register October 7, 2019. The district occupies the area where the town's historic commercial center first developed in the 1890s and is comprised of twelve contributing buildings and one contributing structure. Most of the contributing buildings originate from two periods associated with local economic growth. From 1901 to 1922, Chapin first boomed as a bustling railroad town, giving rise to a combination of brick and frame buildings that largely served businesses that were heavily dependent on the railroad's passenger and freight traffic. The Great Depression and the completion of nearby Lake Murray in 1930 severely disrupted the downtown Chapin economy before a period of revitalization finally began in 1940, when tourism traffic to the lake renewed the district and created demand for new town services and more centralized local government. As a result, the period from 1940 through 1969 saw Chapin's downtown revitalized through new, affordable, and mostly functional commercial architecture.

A boundary revision for the Greer Downtown Historic District was also approved on September 30, 2019.

Tax Credit Spotlight

This month's spotlight is Claussen's Bakery in Columbia. The two-story trapezoidal shaped masonry building was constructed in 1928 in the growing Five Points district. The building features variegated brick and diamond-shaped limestone inserts on the south façade, twenty-pane steel framed windows with central hoppers, and a front entry door with sidelights, a three-part glass transom, and an arched hood. The interior of the building was converted to a 29-room hotel in 1987 which included the installation of a two-story lobby, central stair, a fountain, and lofted rooms on the second floor. The rehabilitation of Claussen's Bakery completed in 2019 converted the building to residential apartments. The rehabilitation work included exterior cleaning, restoration of the front entryway, removal of incompatible 1980's renovations, installation of new mechanical systems, and upgrades to the existing bathrooms. The project is seeking federal and state income-producing tax credits with a private investment cost of approximately $1.69 million.
